Contributors

Arounyadeth Rasphone is from Laos and is currently pursuing a PhD in agricultural economics at the Graduate School of Agriculture, Hokkaido University, Japan. His research is on the roles of irrigation charges in communal managed irrigation systems in Laos, especially pump irrigation schemes.

Deniz Kocak is an MA candidate in political science and modern history. He has studied at the Humboldt-University of Berlin, University of Potsdam, and Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok. His research interests include civil-military relations and security policy in Southeast Asia as well as colonial history in mainland Southeast Asia.

Edward Van Roy is a Visiting Fellow at the Institute of Asian Studies, Chulalongkorn University. He specializes on Bangkok history, with emphasis on its ethnic diversity. His article on “Sampheng: From ethnic isolation to national integration” recently appeared in Sojourn: Journal of Social Issues in Southeast Asia, and another, “Under duress: Lao war captives at Bangkok in the nineteenth century,” is forthcoming in the Journal of the Siam Society.

Fumio Osanami is professor at the Laboratory of Development Economics, Graduate School of Agriculture, Hokkaido University. He specializes in agricultural economics, especially irrigation in developing countries in Asia, including research on Bangladesh, Nepal, Laos, and Japan.

Philipp Borgs was born in Germany. He graduated from the International Business School in Groningen, The Netherlands with a Bachelor of Business Administration. As part of that program, he spent one semester at the Universitas Sam Ratulangi in Manado, Indonesia. In May 2008 he graduated from the MA program in Southeast Asian Studies at Chulalongkorn University with a focus on contemporary politics in Indonesia.
Pornpimon Trichot is a graduate of Thammasat University and the University of Texas (San Antonio). She joined the Institute of Asian Studies, Chulalongkorn University in 1989 as a researcher, and has specialized on Burma/Myanmar, especially its politics, ethnic minorities, human rights abuses, and relations with Thailand.

Rungnapa Yanyongkasemsuk is a lecturer at the Faculty of Political Science and Laws, Burapha University, and a PhD candidate at the Faculty of Political Science, Chulalongkorn University, with a dissertation on the reproduction of elites in contemporary Thai politics.

Supalak Ganjanakhundee is a reporter for The Nation newspaper, and a researcher on current affairs. In a journalism career spanning two decades, he has specialized on regional affairs, notably on the countries in the Mekong basin.

Takumi Kondo is assistant professor at the Laboratory of Development Economics, Graduate School of Agriculture, Hokkaido University. He specializes in agricultural economics, especially irrigation in developing countries in Asia, including research on Bangladesh, Nepal, Laos, and Japan.

Theera Nuchpiam obtained his BA and MA from the Faculty of Arts, Chulalongkorn University, and MA and PhD in International Relations from Lancaster University in the UK. Before early retirement in 2000, he taught at Silpakorn University, serving as dean of its Faculty of Arts and its vice-president for academic affairs. He is now affiliated with Chulalongkorn University's Southeast Asian Studies Program.

Ukrist Pathmanand is a Senior Researcher at the Institute of Asian Studies, Chulalongkorn University. His main interests are the political development of Thailand and Thailand's role in the Greater Mekong Subregion. He has published articles in Journal of Contemporary Asia, Critical Asian Studies, Contemporary Southeast Asia, and Far Eastern Economic Review.